TIME RUNNING OUT

EXCLUSIVE

By DAMIEN FLETCHER

IME is running out for battling Keiton Knight. He is in desperate need of a bone marrow transplant. If he doesn't find a donor by November, the seven-year-old will die.

Today the Daily Mirror is calling on our readers to ask themselves: Can I help this little boy?

Keiton was diagnosed with acute lymphoblast leukaemia – which paral-ysed him from the waist down – in February 2003.

After an heroic struggle he seemed to be getting better. But earlier this year, just as hopes were raised he had beaten the cancer, it came back.

His tearful mum Paris says: "He's been through such hell. Just when we thought he'd beaten it we were told he will die unless we find the right person to donate bone marrow.

"I believe somebody out there reading this could be our hero, they could save my boy's life."

Before January 2003 Keiton was a happy, normal lad, loving his football and days out with grandparents Lorraine Knight and Jack Ansell.

Then a month after his fourth birthday he woke up with a swollen eye. Paris explains: "It so big and puffy that it closed up completely.

"The doctor prescribed antibiotics but the swelling kept coming back.' Keiton began to get terrible pains in his right leg, his gums started bleeding and he had cramps in his toes.

As a sports therapist, 32-year-old Paris suspected something was wrong with his spine. She says: "The doctors thought he had inflamma-tion but I knew it was something worse

Within six weeks Keiton was paralysed from the waist down.

His mum says: "One morning he couldn't move. I pinched him – and he didn't react. It was a horrible moment, I was filled with dread."

Paris drove him to the Royal Alexandra Hospital For Sick Children in Brighton, East Sussex, near their home. She says: "They did an MRI scan four times and I later found out it was because they couldn't believe the size of the tumours inside him.

"Every time the nurse went in and came out he had a longer face so I knew something was terribly wrong."

HE was taken in to a private room and told Keiton had a huge tumour wrapped around his lower spinal area and a large one in his nasal passages.

Paris says: "I asked to look at the to the floor and started screaming."

Keiton was taken to Great Ormond Street Hospital in London where medics diagnosed leukaemia and said it was unlikely he would walk again. Paris says: "I wouldn't accept that he would never walk again, I was deter-mined to help him do it."

Keiton began a gruelling three-year course of chemotherapy at the Royal Marsden Hospital in Surrey. His hair fell out within a week.

She says: "I told Keiton he had cancer, but he didn't understand. He was angry and he hated me for making him do the chemo. He kept on saying: Why are you letting them hurt me mummy?' It took me and five nurses to pin him down to take his medicine. "In the end I had no choice but to tell him: 'If you don't let me give you these drugs you are going to die. The tumours gradually shrank, and Keiton was allowed home in September 2003, but he was still desperately ill.

Paris could not work as she cared for Keiton. His dad had left her before her son was born and she ended up £20.000 in debt.

Such was her desperation that 18 months after Keiton was diagnosed with cancer she even considered killing her son before committing suicide.

She says: "In the end I couldn't pay any bills and the bailiffs were regularly turning up at my door, and I had to declare myself bankrupt.

"I was home alone every night with
